

Shiloh and the Barn Mouse

It came to pass at Green Apple Acres that a new horse came to live on the farm. A tall and handsome horse, he was a beautiful reddish-brown color called “bay,” with a smooth black mane, a long silky black tail and four black socks on his lower legs just above his strong dark hooves. Shiloh was his name and he was a breed of horse known as an Arabian.

Shiloh was swift when he moved. His strong muscles moved his legs in long strides. He held his head high with his ears perfectly pointed forward. His large, dark eyes looked as mysterious as the land of Saudi Arabia itself, a country far, far away. And when he ran, he galloped like the wind with his tail held high. Arabian horses are known as “Drinkers of the Wind,” and that phrase fit Shiloh perfectly.
